REGENT'S WHARF

1820

With the Industrial Revolution and the construction of the railways in North London, Regent's Canal became indispensable and played a fundamental role in the influence London had over the rest of Britain.

1849

As early as 1849 Regent's Wharf, set behind Victorian terraced housing, appeared on maps, depicting a timber yard which was home to 'Haggis and Sons The Caledonian Patent Sawing and Planing Mills'.

1857

By 1857, the site was taken on by Thorley's Food for Cattle with buildings used as stables, a spice mill, packing offices and warehouses. The site continued to attract a wide range of industries from packing to publishing, initially benefiting from the canal connections and more recently enjoying the central King's Cross location.

1892

Thorley's many successes were rewarded with a royal warrant in 1892 and the colours and iconic pig of this important contributor to British industrial heritage are honoured in the new Regent's Wharf brand, weaving the vibrant history of the site into the new campus and continuing the narrative of a place for pioneers.
